In keeping with Roman tradition, the first Christians were buried outside the city, often in catacombs. In time, the well-to-do sought burial inside a church, usually under the floor, or in a grave, preferably close to the altar. As interior space became scarce, churchyards were created. The vast majority of people were simply wrapped in a shroud before burial in a wood coffin, but some were interred with objects symbolic of their admired rank. A fifth-century chieftain might be buried with his weapons, a bishop with his miter, or a king with some of his regalia. By the thirteenth century, tomb sculptures themselves became elaborate status symbols. Carved human figures showed knights in full armor, kings with crown and royal mace, architects with measuring instruments. Later tombs might show an entire family, carved in wood and brightly painted, kneeling in prayer. Brass tomb plates were incised with figures and installed on church floors. Tomb sculpture both commemorated the deceased and invited prayers for his or her future life.
